After some desultory passing the ball was carried over the line in a loose scrimmage, and touched down in self de fence. The kick off was more than returned by Pike with a short run and a capital punt but the back kicked it over again. Jackson then made a short run and a good punt and before be could return it again the Garrison back was collared by Ord, who did capital collaring throughout and the ball was held a short distance from the Garrison goal line. After a little scrimmaging the ball was dribbled over the goal line, but the back, again very much on the alert, saved the try by a touch down in self defence. The ball was at once returned to the Garrison territory after the kick off, and worked close to their goal line. Hayllar got the ball, and passed it to Plumbe, who suc-

THE CHINESE GIANT CHANG ON SKATES.

Sitting alone at a table in the little "back parour" of the Palace Hotel bar, Cincinnati, the other afternoon, enjoying a glass of spiked lemonade through a long straw, and stretching his immense legs over half the floor, was the largest man in the world. He wore fine American clothes, a stiff hat that was pushed far back on his head and disclosed a bare and shaven forehead, and a straight, black wig, done up in massive plaits. "Glad to see you, Chang," said a Times-Star riter, as he noticed the singular figure at the table and recognized his old friend, the Chinese glunt. Chang has a wonderful memory, or at least he is politic enough to pretend to have for newspaper men, and so he remembered the reporter at once and invited him to a seat beside the table.

"Have some lemonade?" said the giant, as he ook off his hat and covered up the seat of a chair The newsman said yes, of course.

"With a spike?" asked Chang, laughingly, for he has captured American slang as effectively as American drinks have captured him. Again the newsman felt that it was his duty to say yes, and as the two merrily tagged at their straws, the big man from Peking observed

"I'm getting tired of dime museums and circuses and country fairs, and so I have concluded to exhibit myself in a new rôle. "In the skating role, ch?"

"Yes," said Chang, "it's much easier work, and then it's pleasanter and more aristocratic, you see. If there is anything that takes the flesh off a giant and makes him feel little, it is to stand all day in a close and crowded museum, dressed in old finery that is hot and hasn't been changed for a week. Oh, no, roller skating is each of $25 for their good behaviour for twelve | much more agreeable, and then there is more money in it, too, just now."

"And you really like roller skating?" "Yes, yes, I am very fond of it. I only have to skate about two hours a day, and I would rather do it than not. How did I come to roller skating? Oh, easy enough. I knew how to skuto already, and my manager, Mr. Campbell, who tions at the rinks. It's a nice way to pass the time, you know, and get rich, too.

"Then you expect to get rich at it?" "Why not? If we keep up as we have begun, we will all get rich. Then next Summer I will go back to my home in China and build me a fine house, or maybe—who knows—maybe I will get married. Liots of American ladies have wanted to marry ma, but I have always refused, because I thought myself too high above them, see? and the jolly giant gently stroked the reporter's ribs, while a wonderful smile spread over his broad face, and a laugh escaped him that you could have heard in Cumminsville.

Chang doesn't speak English with charming or graceful fluency, not half so charmingly or gracefully as he has been quoted above; but he has an odd, slow humour that keeps you forever

"Why, I heard mother tell stealing about 820 in silver from the Su Fung | Aunt Hannah that she hoped I wouldn't take decorated with birds and blossoms which enliven Perak Tin Mining and Smelting Company the windows of dealers in Oriental goods and artistic tea merchants. The number possibly is Punjom and Sunghio Dan Samantan Mining much greater of persons who are unaware, or only imperiectly aware, of the processes of which cloisonné enamels are the results, and which have for many generations, since the introduction of the art from China, formed one of the principal artistic industries of Japan. Uninventive themselves, the Japaness possess in a singular degree the faculty of perfecting the arts which they have acquired from other nations. Unwearying assiduity, combined with extreme delicacy of touch, render them unrivalled as workmen in the management and elaboration of detail. Their paintings, on percelain, executed Chinese Imperial Loan of 1884 C-5 per cent. with a microscopic minuteness and accuracy, and the fine intricacy of their inlaid and overlaid metal work are sufficient proofs of their powers in this line. But if any doubt still existed it would be speedily dissipated by a visit to a workshop where cloisonné is being made, and an inspection of the processes involved in its manufacture. The greatest living maker of cloisonne in Japan, perhaps in the world also, is one Namikawa, who resides in Kyoto, the old capital of the Mikados. A nobleman by birth, he suffered in the troublous times which accompanied the overthrow of the Shogun, and, like many of his compeers, had recourse to trade as a means of livelihood, without in any way losing caste. He has established a reputation as the first cloisonné manufacturer of the day, and his wares fetch from the dealers whatever price he chooses to set upon them. His courtesy to visitors is extreme, and he seems for more anxious to show them over his establish ment than to sell them his goods.

In a clean, siry apartment, where the light comes in softly through the paper walls, the workers, men and women, can be seen at their tasks. On the surface of the object, generally of copper, which is to be enamelled, the design Mapila 29.98 | 86 is worked out with tiny metal fillets like flattened wires, of varying lengths and shapes.

These are fastened on with a strong glue, and Shanghai..... form the cloisons, or partitions, which are to separate the differently coloured enamels. This worder !-part of the work seems of almost maddening nicety, and must require immense calmness of nerves and steadiness of hand. The design having been thus fixed the enamels are introduced between the clossons, in the form of a dry paste, by means of diminutive chopsticks. The whole is then baked, after which the various little cracks and crevices which appear in the fused enamel are filled in with fresh paste, and the article again placed in the oven. In the superior work this process is repeated again and spain until the surface is uniform and without flaw, though as yet rough and lustreless. The polishing is done with a stone, and is a long and tedious operation, occupying several months in the case of articles of any size. The effect of the process is to grind down the inequalities of the enamelled surface, until the design is left clear and indelible, outlined by the cloisons. It is obvious that wares which require so much and with a fine vitreous lustre. time and skill in their manufacture should command a high price; and very high accordingly are the prices for good work. Inferior cloisonné can be bought cheap enough, but its purchase is not to be recommended; for, besides flaws in the workmanship which are apparent at once, the colouring of the enamels is apt to fade. Of course, in order to distinguish good work from bad, it is necessary, as in everything else, to be something of a connoisseur; and especially difficult is it to tell colouring which will be durable from that which will prove transient. With regard to the blue colour which so often forms the background of cloisonné wares, it is important that this should be of the right shade; as there are blues of many kinds besides the pure turquoise tint that is to be sought after. The amount of decoration, of course, is one of the considerations to be taken into account in determining the value of the article; but this must not be too exclusively relied upon, as it not unfrequently happens that a great deal of labour is expended upon ornamentation which is intended to conceal other defects, and thus the best work is often also the simplest. Aback-groundintroduced and made a speciality of by Namikawa is composed of a transparent blood coloured enamel, dotted with flakes of an opaque white colour. Another maker living at Yokohama inserts among his enamels small pieces of gold-stone; and other artists have different specialties of a similar kind. Antique cloisonno is, as a rule, much discoloured, and is, for decorative purposes, of little value; time will show whether the works of the famous modern makers are to prove more durable.-Pall Malt Gazette.
